As Malcolm Frazer says:

"The difference between winning and losing a case is often just a matter of finding and using the digital evidence generated from the moment someone clocks in for the day."

OVERVIEW

Much evidence of wrong-doing can be sourced from records generated by computers. These may be documents, videos, audio files or photographs generated by computers. Meridian Training's Evidence in the Digital Age is the only course focusing specifically on this tricky but abundant evidentiary field.

The course shows delegates how digital evidence can be found, how it may be obtained, how it may be led as evidence in hearings, what it proves, when it must be rebutted by the other side and the weight it has. The objective is to allow parties to a dispute to use digital evidence effectively to prove their version.

The course is highly interactive. The facilitators have experience using digital evidence in misconduct proceedings and delegates will be exposed to a range of role-plays, case studies and group discussions that will enrich their understanding.

OUTCOMES

- The Electronics Communication and Transaction Act
- What is considered digital evidence
- Where do I find digital evidence
- How do I preserve the quality of digital evidence
- Rica and interception
- Digital Evidence and the hearsay rules
